Cardiac failure during isoproterenol infusion in conscious rats. The acute cardiotoxic effects of isoproterenol were investigated in conscious rats. Male Wistar rats weighing between 250 and 350 g were infused intravenously with isoproterenol in doses ranging from 1 to 10 micrograms/min/100 gm body weight for 1 hr. Pressure in the ascending aorta and cardiac output were measured at intervals of 30 to 120 min. Isoproterenol in doses of more than 5 micrograms/min/100 gm body weight induced a significant decrease in cardiac output and aortic pressure. The decrease in cardiac output was directly proportional to the dose of isoproterenol. The increased ratio of the pulse pressure to mean aortic pressure was a good parameter for the evaluation of left ventricular contractility. To measure the degree of aortic muscle relaxation, we calculated the product of pulse pressure and cross-sectional area of the ascending aorta. The product is a function of velocity of blood flow along the large artery and the internal cross-sectional area of the aorta. Isoproterenol induced a significant increase in the product, suggesting that it is possible to detect isoproterenol-induced cardiac depression in conscious animals.
