Puckoon, also known as Piquet or Piquet, is a pocket game which is similar to the game of Gin and the game of Whist. It may be played with a single piece, with two, with four, and with five. The game is played by four players in two partnerships. Each player holds a set of six cards. These cards are turned face down and each player's hand is dealt three cards. The two-player version is usually played with players facing each other, although the four-player version is usually played with two facing two. Typically a variant of piquet is used, in which the cards are dealt to the players in the order that they will play, i.e. face up. This is one of the more complex games and therefore best suited to extensive practice. The game is usually played for a stake of "bet"; this is usually agreed before play begins. The bet is varied according to the number of players, the availability of "quiet" or "silent" cards, and the size of the bet. The game is usually won by scoring the most points by combining tricks. The winner, if there is one, is the first to make five tricks. If there is no winner, then the game is a "no-trick" and the game ends immediately. Rules of piquet games However, it is most often played by two players against each other; this is the most traditional version. As with most such games, the method of scoring is similar to bridge or contract bridge. The two players take turns, in a clockwise manner. Before the cards are played, the "trick" is chosen. This is usually the most common win. There are various ways the trick is chosen. One common method is for the winner to play the lowest card in the discard pile. Another is for the winner to play the best card in the discard pile. If neither player can make a successful play, then the trick is shared by the opponents. The cards are placed face up, so the first turn is usually taken by the player on the dealer's left. Players play cards from their hand to the trick pile face up. A common method is to use a silent third round. This allows a player to wait until the next player in order receives the cards after that player. When this happens, the next player can play one card from their own hand in addition to the card that the first player has. This
